The most basic form of communication is nonverbal. This includes body language and facial expressions. It differs from verbal communication in fundamental ways. For one thing, it is less structured, which makes it difficult to study. A person cannot pick up a book on nonverbal language and master the grammar of gestures and a vocabulary of expressions that are so common in our culture. Nonverbal communication also differs from verbal communication in terms of intent and spontaneity. We generally plan our words and are fairly careful with what we say. But when we communicate nonverbally, we sometimes do so unconsciously. We do not mean to raise an eyebrow or blush, but these actions more often than not come naturally. Often without our consent, our emotions are written all over our faces.

Although nonverbal communication is unplanned, it may have more impact than verbal communication. Nonverbal cues are especially used in conveying feelings. They account for ninety five percent of the emotional meaning that is exchanged in any interaction. In fact, nonverbal communication is so powerful that it actually releases mood-altering chemicals in the sender as well as in the receiver. Smiling makes us feel happier, whereas guarded gestures tend to make us hostile and less receptive. This fact was confirmed by an experiment involving two groups of college students who attended the same lecture. One group, the experimental group, was told to listen to the lecture with their arms tightly folded across their chests and their legs uncrossed - like a barrier, the second group was told they could listen to the lecture in any way they pleased. Most of them sat relaxed and listened to the lecture. When tested after the lecture, the experimental group retained nearly 40 percent less information compared to the second group who had been more relaxed.
